MEMORANDUM

I. Special Objectives of Legal Training at Georgia State University

In view of the prime location of this university in the heart of a metropolitan legal and commercial center, the type of legal education to be offered in evening and day courses should satisfy certain uncommon aims both on the elementary and the advanced levels.

A. Basic first year legal training for prospective lawyers, businesspersons, paralegal personnel, law librarians, teachers of law in the school system and civil servants.

1. Use of a core curriculum offering a survey of the legal system in America as the most economical method for teaching law.

2. Stress on learning basic principles of law rather than case analysis.

3. Coverage of all major aspects of each subject instead of emphasis on the special area of interest of a particular instructor.

B. Advanced second and third year courses.

1. Development of analytical skills, case method and litigation techniques.

2. Interrelationship of law with allied fields (business, social science, etc.)

3. Utilization of facilities in the geographic area, such as the courts, major law firms and businesses, or legal aid offices, to supplement academic studies with practical experience.

4. Public service objectives to meet future requirements for the certification of specialists in selected fields of law.

II. The criteria for the selection of instructors in law

A. In addition to the customary procedure for hiring professors to teach at this university, preference should be given to candidates who combine the J.D. degree with a master's degree in an appropriate allied field or with extensive experience in government, business and the professional world. Reputation in the field is important.

B. In general, the criteria for instructors should include: character, a cooperative spirit, concern for students, dedication to teaching, scholarly inclinations, craftsmanship, and interest in public service for reasons other than monetary remuneration.

C. Part-time instructors for evening courses should be experienced lawyers or judges evidencing professional maturity, practical skill, integrity, and an unquestioned reputation among peers.

D. Full-time instructors should, in addition to the criteria set forth in II B, demonstrate scholarship and pedagogical motivation. It would be ideal to attract lawyers with about six years of practical experience in the legal and business world since this would provide a background on which to draw in teaching and could eliminate competition with the individual's hopes of an approaching partnership in a law firm.

E. No stereotype should be set up since a good college offers a diversity of experiences, approaches and types of professors.
