STATE GOVERNMENT

Allow State Government to Administer Federal Social-Service Funds to Faith-Based Organizations.

CODE SECTIONS: O.C.G.A. § 50-1-7 (new)
BILL NUMBER: HB 1407
ACT NUMBER: 926
GEORGIA LAWS: 2002 Ga. Laws 1147
SUMMARY: The Act provides a mechanism under which faith-based organizations in Georgia can use designated federal funds.
EFFECTIVE DATE: July 1, 2002

History

The Welfare Reform Act of 1996 included a provision that recognized the role that religious organizations have played throughout the history of the United States in administering aid to those in need.1 The provision, known as “charitable choice,” allowed religious organizations to deliver social services that the government traditionally handled, such as welfare-to-work and drug addiction programs.2 The charitable choice provision applied to a small number of federal programs until President George W. Bush launched his campaign in January 2001 seeking to expand the pool of eligible programs through faith-based federal funds administration for social services.3

A White House report used to support the President’s initiative found that few federal programs actively complied with the charitable choice provision.4 The report pointed out that while more than half of the federal government’s social services expenditures, which amounted to several hundred billion dollars annually, was allocated to contracts with nonprofit organizations, little has gone to faith-based groups. In addition, according to a nationwide survey, thirty-eight states, including Georgia, violate federal law in dispensing federal funds through social services contracts that sidestep or ignore the charitable choice provision.

However, the Georgia Constitution makes compliance with this provision difficult by explicitly prohibiting the direct or indirect expenditure of tax money on or to any religious groups. The prohibition is so unambiguous that the Georgia Legislature has put forth House Resolution 131 seeking to amend the Georgia Constitution to allow full compliance with the 1996 Welfare Reform Act.

HB 1407 is part of the national debate and effort to facilitate the administration of federal social service funds to faith-based organizations. Included in the Governor’s package, HB 1407 is a bipartisan proposal seeking to provide a mechanism under which faith-based organizations in Georgia can use designated federal funds. Supporters assert that allowing faith-based organizations to compete for federal money on an equal footing with other nonprofit organizations will improve social programs and services “by utilizing the experience and altruistic drive possessed by these bodies.” On the other hand, critics emphasize the importance of a constitutionally and socially acceptable separation between church and state. HB 1407 seeks to ensure this separation through (1) limiting the use of federal funds for administrative purposes only; (2) requiring the provision of alternative service providers when individual recipients object to the religious character of the organization; (3) prohibiting discrimination by the recipient organizations against individuals on the basis of religion or religious beliefs; (4) prohibiting the use of federal funds for any form of sectarian worship, instruction, proselytization, or promotion of any particular system of faith or worship; and (5) requiring that recipient institutions be either

The Act

The Act creates new Code section 50-1-7 which seeks to allow state government, while participating in federal programs, to administer programs and provide services through contracting with charitable, private, and religious organizations. The new Code section, however, limits the use of state and local government funds to administrative purposes only. The Act requires that an alternative, acceptable provider be available to any person who objects to the religious character of an organization from which that person receives, or would receive, services. Simultaneously, the Act forbids any religious organization that provides program assistance or services from refusing services to any individual on the basis of religion, religious beliefs, or participation in or refusal to participate in a religious practice or rite. New Code section 50-1-7 also stipulates that no funds provided to a religious organization for program assistance or services be used for sectarian worship, instruction, proselytization, or promotion of any particular system of faith or worship. Finally, the Act requires that all entities not registered under Section 501(c)(3) of the United States Internal Revenue Code agree to submit to financial audits ensuring their compliance with the limitations set forth in new Code section 50-1-7.
